Book by Fredric Wertham

With a John Hopkins invite to come to America, and encouragement by Sigmund Freud for this medically-trained German to become a psychiatrist, Frederic Wertham had an important vantage point into mankind's systemic inclination toward inhumanity. This small book, an excerpt of his classic, A Sign for Cain, is a must-read for those interested to know how and when Germany's medical community became strongly vested in mass killing by gas chambers and by other methods as a treatment for social ailments, all before a single Jew was killed in any concentration camp. Germany was at the height of European science, art, and education, and none of this protected it from descending into barbarity. In addition to his insightful research on the effects of gratuitous violence in pop culture, published elsewhere, here in TGEP, Wertham's warning is that the U.S. medical community may fail to learn from history. Also highly recommended: Cleansing the Fatherland: Nazi Medicine and Racial Hygiene

Must read for anyone who wants to understand the factors that produced the Holocaust. Also gives a chilling verdict against the American medical community because of its support for euthanasia.
